Camp Crane: An Ideal Spot for a Hospital for Sick and Wounded Sent Home from the War Zone Abroad

While there are rumors about the health and welfare of the men in the camps, a story that has come down to us is that this was far from a popular movement. It was not, of course, that the Army did not care for the men, but that there was reluctance on the part of the men to give up the comforts of their barracks for the hardships and dangers of the front. The Army, however, has always been willing to make the necessary sacrifices for the welfare of the men.

In his address to Congress, President Wilson said that the Army was doing its best to care for the men, and that the men were doing their best to care for themselves.

The new camp had been established at Camp Crane, a small town in the State of Ohio. The camp was situated on a hill overlooking the town, and was surrounded by a thick forest.

The camp was built on a farm, and the farmers were encouraged to take care of the men as they would their own families.

The camp was well supplied with water, and the men were provided with hot meals three times a day.

The men were given the chance to work, and the farm was used for this purpose.

There were many other advantages at Camp Crane, and the men were very much pleased with the way they were being taken care of.

The camp was well worth visiting, and it is recommended to all visitors.
