SANDIPE is usually the last thing that is thought of when discussing the potential effects of the current pandemic. However, the sudden halt of all sports in Pittsburgh has left many wondering what life will be like when the virus subsides.

The Pirates, who were originally scheduled to play 154 games this season, have now been forced to cancel all of their games. The decision was made after a player tested positive for COVID-19, triggering a series of protocols that ultimately led to the suspension of the season.

PIRATE CHIEFS LOOK AHEAD

The announcement has left fans scrambling to find other ways to support their team. Many have turned to watching old games or following updates on the team's social media accounts.

The uncertainty has also affected players, who are now forced to wait for the pandemic to pass before they can return to the field.

GAVE IT TO SERVICE

Many local fans, in particular, have taken to volunteering for organizations that have seen an increased need for help due to the pandemic.

The move has been met with mixed reactions, with some fans feeling that the team's decision was necessary, while others believe it was a missed opportunity to keep the game going.

BRINGING UP FATHER

Despite the uncertainty, many fans remain optimistic about the future of Pittsburgh sports. With the team's history and tradition, they believe that it is only a matter of time before they are able to return to the field.

In the meantime, fans continue to support their team in any way they can, hoping that the pandemic will pass soon and they can once again enjoy the game they love.
